

The crashing copper

Not the way to catch criminals, not the way to use a Lamborghini either...

Story by James, 11

The force's favourite car under one of the two cars it crashed into after swerving to avoid another car.

It was in 2004 that proud car maker Lamborghini gave the Italian police the most recent Lamborghini Gallardo to use as a force car. But now for five years it's finally burnt the last bit of petrol.

The Italian police were at a student job fair near the Italian town of Cremona showing off the force's most loved and favourite car, the Lamborghini Gallardo. As it was leaving reports say the car tried to avoid another car in its path, then ploughing straight into two other cars that were stationary.

It was taken to the police garage but it was pretty easy to see it was impossible to repair.

The driver of the exotic car had several bruises and suffered a broken rib. The second officer only had nasty bruises.

The car was worth 165,000 Euros or 150,000 pounds. The six speed, 500 horse-power car can go from 0-100km/h (or 60mph) in four seconds. It is not yet known if the police will get another car but the Italian police men are upset about the loss of their favourite car they now can only see on the showroom floor...

Hello, I'm Mr. Monster Munch

Eat a bag of crisps a day, then change your name!

Story by James, 11

A man who ate a different flavour of his favourite bag of crisps Monster Munch for breakfast, lunch and dinner has changed his name to Monster Munch.

Chris Hunter who is a plumber starts the day not with a bowl of healthy bran flakes, but with a packet of cheese and onion Monster Munch! Then has roast beef for lunch and flaming hot bag for dinner. He has also made a recipe for Monster Munch with rice and pasta dishes.

Another reason the 26 year-old changed his name because he was dared by his friends. He mixes it with most ordinary meals but has not cracked mixing the crisps with breakfast cereal.

His friends call him Mr. Munch or Monster Munch although he did not consult the crisp's maker Walkers.

SCHOOL REPORT

